CURRENT AND RECENT PROJECTS

1. Research and book project: “Sociology of Genocide Knowledge: The Armenian Case and Beyond”

(supported by Arsham and Charlotte Ohanessian Chair funds; book project supported by Stellenbosch Institute for Advanced Study, South Africa [fall 2018], and Paris Institute for Advanced Study, France [spring 2019])

The book in progress develops a sociology of genocide knowledge. It does so in an era in which institution-building in response to mass atrocities collides with denial. This denial is at times strategically planned in response to acknowledgment and supported by a calculated reluctance to intervene. The project thus explores struggles between acknowledgment and denial, and their impact on how societies and societal groups know about genocides, how they classify, collectively represent and remember them. It attends to social interactions, carrier groups, symbols and rituals, power relations, social fields and institutional contexts in which struggles are carried out. Focusing on the Armenian genocide, data include law texts, legislative records, media reports, archival documents, documentary films and interviews. Special attention is devoted to French legislation pertaining to the memory of the Armenian genocide and to related Swiss and US court cases. I am currently exploring options for comparative analysis in communication with colleagues across national and continental divides and across disciplinary boundaries in anthropology, the humanities and the arts (on representations, narratives and memories); history (shaping of historical accounts); political science (political processes); and law (legal texts and contexts).

2. Grand Challenges Grant: The Minnesota Model: Building Interdisciplinary Capacity to Defend Human Rights in Challenging Times (with Fionnuala Ní Aoláin; Jessica Stanton and Barbara Frey) (2019-21)

This Grand Challenges project, funded by the Provost’s Office of the University of Minnesota, focuses on two intersecting themes: Enhancing Individual and Community Capacity and Fostering Just and Equitable Communities. We are concerned with the relationship between human rights and the enhancement of individual and community capacity amidst a changing human rights terrain and interrelated, growing social inequalities. We thus address a reciprocal relationship, in which the pursuit of human rights enhances capacities and those capacities, in turn, strengthen human rights protections. This proposal advances our project of building a “Minnesota Model,” established on a long-standing university and community commitment to human rights education, research and advocacy over decades. Four co-Principal Investigators received this grant on behalf of a community of scholars and external partners in an effort to understand current patterns of human rights retrenchment and to model effective scholar-practitioner responses to human rights violations.

3. Book: Representing Mass Violence: Conflicting Responses to Human Rights Violations in Darfur (Oakland, CA: University of California Press, 2015; German translation, Vittorio Klostermann Publ., Frankfurt, 2017)

The expansion of international criminal law is associated with a criminalization of those who cause and execute mass atrocities. Yet, the social fields of humanitarian aid and diplomacy generate quite different representation than criminal law. A comparative analysis of eight countries displays varying receptivity for these competing narratives. Empirical evidence is based on content analysis of 3,387 media reports and commentaries on the violence in Darfur and on in-depth interviews with Africa correspondents and Sudan specialists in NGOs and foreign ministries from the eight countries. Suggesting a differentiation of field and globalization theoretical arguments, this book contributes to the sociology of knowledge. The book is based on National Science Foundation-funded research.
